

The following numbers represent the typical average and limit values for the designs, overall height and building density, which are hardly exceeded in the self's building also after a generation:

About 60 per cent of the houses are traditional houses with courtyard, 40 per cent are compact houses or mixing types. A third of properties is only moderately covered, i.e. it existed still an relatively large yard and the third part is nearly completely covered. The dominating design is still the house with courtyard, at the same time compact houses and mixing types become more and more a thing of interest, because small and narrow properties as well as trade and commercial activities require other designs.

After 20 to 30 years about 30 per cent of the self's building houses is still single-storey, 50 per cent is two storey and 20 per cent three-storey. The most of the houses become another storey added after ten to 15 years.
